Not illustrated. 1895 Excerpt: . of the superintendents and teachers have seen and appreciated the helpfulness of drawing in connection with the other studies, and good results have been secured in spite of these difficulties. The almost universal request is for a definite and detailed outline of what should be done. Perhaps the best answer to this would be a course in drawing, planned to cover the work of six years in two divisions, the first taking up primary drawing in three years, and the second drawing for grammar grades in three years, thus requiring but two classes in each school, the course to be arranged in lessons given in detail and illustrated, so that definite steps for each month s work could be given to every teacher. I may add that such a course is now in preparation, and we confidently hope it may be placed in the hands...
